

Financial goals are ultimately always personal goals. They regard something relating to you and/or your family. Financial goals have nothing to do with the government, or with the economy. They have nothing to do, in the near-term, with asset prices or ‘performance.’ What we do for our clients, therefore, is spend almost no time contemplating the economy, and virtually all of our time helping them work toward the accomplishment of their goals.

The primary long-term financial goal for most families is the creation of a lifestyle sustaining income that will persist from the first year of retirement until the last, whenever that may be. Complicating this goal is a challenge resulting from of two issues: longevity and rising costs. For the average 62-year-old married couple, one spouse will live into his or her nineties, and in many cases both will. If the couple retires mid-sixties, this means thirty or more years of retirement, during which their dollar cost of living will more than double, and perhaps triple.

It is ultimately the protection of one’s purchasing power in this rising cost environment which determines whether a family will have the permanent income they’ll need to maintain their lifestyle, dignity, and independence. In developing a long-term financial plan seeking this outcome, predominant focus must be on the increase of one’s wealth during those thirty or more years of rising costs, during which time at least one dollar of income must be generated for every dollar of expenses.

It is through the creation and review of a customized written plan, along with appropriate long-term behavior and the disciplined use of a systematic investment philosophy that such an objective may most likely be accomplished. To each of our clients, it is with this perspective that we commit our services.
